NCCU Tutoring Center Boosting Student Success

SEPTEMBER 18, 2025 ·  CIERRA LUNDY

Since N.C. Central University's Academic Success Center opened in January, the tutoring center's attendance has steadily increased as more students have learned about its services and location in the Farrison-Newton Communications Building, according to Teah Smith, the director of the center.

In just the areas of chemistry, accounting and decision sciences, and math, 77 students have taken advantage of its tutoring services since the Fall 2025 semester, she said. She's still calculating figures in other fields.

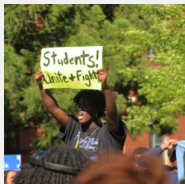

"We make tutoring seem like it's a bad thing, and it has a stigma that you can't do it, so you need help," Smith said. "But we like to tell people you would rather be proactive instead of reactive."

center return at least twice a week for tutoring, she said. Students are asked to complete a satisfaction survey to support they received and suggest possible improvements overall.

Students who return to the tutoring center for academic support their first semester are due to return for additional help and study time, Smith said.

Interested persons must meet eligibility criteria and undergo baseline testing. Those who qualify to take part in the study will be compensated for their participation. Those who do not qualify for study participation will receive treatment referrals as needed.

CLASSIFIEDS

While students most commonly visit the center for science support, Smith has added tutors for history and humanities classes, as well. The center also has opportunities for students who want to be peer tutors.

The positions open at the end of each semester. Students looking to be a tutor must have a high A or B in the class they wish to tutor to be eligible to apply for the position.

Smith began her position when the center opened. She added academic mentoring to the program, which includes two student workers who help other students keep themselves organized and teach them effective scheduling methods. She also shared that the center will be expanding its online tutoring hours soon.

NCCU student Charity Crawford uses the tutoring center as a study space. She says she goes to the tutoring center at least twice a week.

“I just started using the tutoring center this semester,” Crawford said, “but I got an A on my last quiz after studying in the tutoring center.”

Smith emphasized that the tutoring center’s door is always open to students, and they can still schedule an appointment.
